We have Magazines Galore!

Did you know?

No time to read a book? Try a magazine for quick entertainment or education. We have about 85 subscriptions in print with the older issues available for loan. If you prefer electronic format, you can read from our Zinio subscription that has a mix of titles, some of which are also in the print collection and some are unique to the electronic subscription. The library’s website has a link to the Florida Electronic Library which has more scholarly journals and also full text of a number of newspapers.

Edgar & Lucy, by American author Victor Lodato had me hooked from the opening line, “Having a life meant having a story. Even at eight, Edgar knew this.” Edgar was a smart and perceptive boy, but he did not really know much about his story. He had a grandmother Florence, whom he loved, and a young mother Lucy whom he did not understand. He had no father and did not know the story of the father he did not have. He did not really have friends at school, and liked the solitude of walking home through the woods alone and that made him a target for the school’s biggest bully. Everyone whose life touched Edgar had a significant story. Florence of course, Lucy especially, but also Frank, Conrad of the green truck, the bully, the butcher, even Emma, the baby sister Edgar got to name. The events in this novel in any other writer’s hands might have included screaming headlines, police, social workers and mental health professionals tripping over each other, demands for justice on everyone’s lips. But Lodato treated everyone’s story from a different slant with dignity and purpose. He set logic and judgement aside as he invited the reader to view these characters, warts and all, with calm understanding and even sympathy. I hated to see this compelling story come to an end.

A BOOK BY EVERY CHAIR...BY PHYLIS

Summer’s coming. It is hot already, therefore perfect timing for getting lost in the pages of fast moving fun novels. I Found You, by British author Lisa Jewell created just the right mood, characters and settings to allow me to suspend reality and participate in the mysteries surrounding the woman on her own living in a remote beach location, the stranger without a memory, the bride whose husband did not come home, the memories of vacations and tragedies from long ago, and the challenge of following the clues to tie them all together so that everyone involved could go on happily ever after….but wait? Does the end justify the means? Has my sense of right, wrong and justice just been manipulated by this satisfying, ‘feel good’ little novel—and why don’t I care?

Wintering, by Minnesota author Peter Geye is a great novel to read on a hot day. Geye, born and raised in Minneapolis, like fellow Minnesotan Garrison Keillor, knows how to bring to life with spot on regional authenticity the characters around whom this story is built. He sets the story in the Lake of the Woods boundary waters among the wild myriad lakes, islands, waterfalls, and portages tucked right up against the Canadian border—waters plied by the legendary Voyageurs where city folk challenge themselves canoeing in the summer. But his characters are the year rounders, the families who go back generations there (even though they go down to the cities for their education) they make their living up there on the Gunflint trail. Harry Eide and Charlie Aas, the mayor are the patriarchs of two of those families, and their feud goes back….When Gustav Eide, the narrator, is a strapping 18 year old he treasures the time his father spends with him in the boathouse teaching him the family skill of building canoes. Once they’ve finished a pair of magnificent ones, Harry, who is obsessed with maps, invites him along up river into the wilderness to winter. It is early fall, and Gus feels scared, but excited, and says to his father, “If we get lost we’ll be together, right?” Along with maps, they have fishing gear, tents and sleeping bags, skis and snowshoes, a hatchet, knives, guns, hats, and heavy clothing. They are prepared. This was a shivering good read. There are impossibly steep portages, spectacular views, moose, bear, deer, fresh fish cooked over open fires, snow, ice, cold, more and more snow…..even the soul-wrenching sound of shifting lake ice…..
